Key points about prior knowledge of the Conservative Party's Law Reform Agenda

- The conservative party indicated in its 2011 platform that it would introduce criminal law reforms, if elected. However, it provided only high level descriptions of what those reforms might be. No details were provided, which would have allowed provinces to undertake analysis of potential cost impacts.

While BC and other provinces were involved in discussing various criminal law reforms with the federal government over the past few years, the introduction of C-10 was not simply a summary of that work.
