Hospital Harm Data Limitations and Considerations for Interpretation

This hospital harm measure provides a high level view of patient safety and the occurrence of harm in Canadian hospitals at a pan-Canadian level. While it is also a good tool for monitoring and identifying potential opportunities for improving patient safety within individual hospitals, it currently cannot be used to compare quality of care and safety across hospitals. This is because:

- The results are not risk-adjusted. Hospitals serve different patient populations. In order to compare health system performance it is important to take into account the hospital's patient's case mix and demographics. Given the wide range of harmful events captured by this measure, it is very difficult to develop a risk adjustment methodology to account for these differences.*
- Variation in documentation. The indicator is calculated using data that is routinely collected by hospitals. The identification of harm relies heavily on a physician's notes in a patient's health record. Differences in documentation and staff resources across hospitals may result in differences in the ability to capture harmful events in the data across hospitals. This could result in hospitals with better documentation appearing to have higher rates.*

Other Limitations

CIHI regularly conducts reabstraction studies to assess the quality of its data. The most recent study focused on some of the clinical groups in the Hospital Harm Framework and found that harm captured in these groups was generally confirmed in patient charts. However, due to the reliance on physician documentation, the hospital harm measure likely does not capture all occurrences of harm, especially within some clinical groups such as pressure ulcer and infections due to Clostridium difficile, MRSA and VRE where documentation may occur in nurses notes or other infection control documentation.

It is also important to remember that all occurrences of harm are counted equally as severity cannot be determined in the data used to capture harm. In reality not all harmful events have the same level of severity.

Finally, not all occurrences of harm are captured by the indicator, for example harm to patients outside acute inpatient care (e.g., in the ED), harm that was only discovered on a subsequent visit, or "near misses" are not captured.
